Goldberg Urges U.S. Grant Fruits Of Life To Understratum

Whatever America now achieves in civil rights must depend, basically, on the reaction of the public, Associate Justice Arthur J. Goldberg of the Supreme Court said in New York recently. "We are in perilous times," he asserted at the 83nd annual commencement exercises of Yeshiva University. He said that President Kennedy, the judiciary, and legislatures could accomplish much, reports the New York Times, but that "the great challenge of these days lies in the response of the people."

Justice Goldberg said he believed that the survival of freedom throughout the world would be endangered if the United States failed to project its concept of individual liberty.

"Yet we cannot be successful abroad unless we are successful at home," he continued. "The measure is what we do to make the fruits of our life available to the poor, to the prejudiced against, to the discriminated against, to those whose highest reach does not touch the bottom rung of the ladder."

Furthermore, success at home must be measured in our respect for law by those who govern and are governed alike, he said. Justice Goldberg said there could be no "disengagement from responsibility" for any citizen.

He received an honorary Doctor of Laws degree with a citation that read, in part:

"Blessed with wisdom of the heart and courage of the mind, you are today a source of inspiration to all who are striving for the advancement of justice and the strengthening of our democratic

Other recipients of honorary degrees were Yaakov David Herzog, Israeli Ambassador to Canada; Dr. Eugene Paul Wigner, of Princeton University; Prof. Louis Henkin, of Columbia University; Dr. Shelley Ray Saphire, director of Yeshiva University high schools; Representative Abraham J. Multer, of Brooklyn; all Doctor of Humane Letters; and Rabbi Mendell Lewittes, of Young Israel Synagogue, of Montreal, Doctor of Divinity.

W.J.C. Pamphlet Is About New Swiss Law On Unclaimed Assets

The World Jewish Congress in New York has issued a pamphlet containing an English translation of the recently adopted Swiss Decree on "Unclaimed Properties of Stateless Persons and Foreigners in Switzerland" and its implementary regulation. The law lifts the stringent Swiss banking regulations that protected the identity of depositors and have, until now, prevented action regarding bank accounts, deposits, or other assets left unclaimed since the war.

Enactment of the Swiss legislation follows long negotiations, both by the Allies and various Jewish organizations, Swiss and foreign. Shortly after World War II, the World Jewish Congress took up the problem with the Swiss authorities and the Allied governments, in particular the United States.

The demands were both for facilitating the recovery of assets for which heirs are available, and the legislation for unclaimed accounts, safes, safe deposit boxes, and other assets belonging to persons who died at Hitler's hands. Joint and separate action by other bodies continued for a long time. Although research and drafts were prepared many years ago, it was due to the impact of the Eichmann case that final action started in 1961.

The Decree deals with all kinds of properties of which it is known or presumed that they belonged to persons who have been "victims of racial, religious, or political persecution."

Translation of the law was made

Dr. Goodman stated, in issuing the new pamphlet, that although there were not exact figures available to indicate the possible number of claimants, or the amount that might become available to them, there were undoubtedly thousands who will, in one way or another, be concerned with this matter. The translation was issued to facilitate action by potential beneficiaries to the assets at present "frozen."

Ben-Gurion View That Only A Jew Who Goes To Live In Israel Is A Zionist, Soft-Pedalled By Eshkol

Premier Levi Eshkol said in Tel Aviv that all Jews living in oppression, except those in the Soviet Union, would be evacuated to Israel by 1970, at the Sixty-Sixth annual convention of the Zionist Organization of America. The recent week-long convention, the first ever held outside the United States, ended with the election of Dr. Max Nussbaum, of Hollywood, Cal., to a second term as president.

Mr. Eshkol told the members that they must share responsibility with Israel for promoting a strong stream of immigrants from Western countries, says the New York Times. He did not disclose figures or sources of immigration because details are kept secret to avert Arab attempts at obstruction. But he said that if the present trend continued through the nineteen-eighties, the "in-gathering" from countries where Jews could not live freely would be completed.

In his appeal to the American Zionists to help increase Israel's immigration, the Premier was markedly more temperate than his predecessor, David Ben-Gurion, who maintained it was inadvisable for Jews to call themselves Zionists if they had no intention of coming to Israel to live.

The organization adopted a mild resolution calling upon all its regions to seek and encourage people planning to settle, work, or study in Israel.

Foreign Minister Golda Meir appeared at the convention to answer political questions. She said friends of Israel had been advising her not to take seriously the speeches in which President Gamal Abdel Nasser of the United Arab Republic has declared that he will destroy Israel when the Arabs are strong enough.

It would be criminal of Israel's leadership to accept that reassurance, she said. Mrs. Meir charged that it had been proved "that Nasser has been using gas in Yemen."

If he used gas weapons against his brother Arabs, she said, "he wouldn't hesitate to use them against Israel."

There were indications of a more tolerant attitude toward the Zionist Organization than during the stormy years of its association with former Premier David Ben-Gurion. The Premier had vexed American Zionists by asserting that the only good Zionist was one who came to settle in Israel, says the New York Times. Today the Zionists were received with the softer tones of Israel's new leaders, President Zalman Shazar, and Premier Levi Eshkol.

Both men called on American Zionists to come to Israel and to help build the young state. But the difference between them and Mr. Ben-Gurion seemed to be that theirs was an appeal while Mr. Ben-Gurion's had sounded more like an order.

President Shazar was present at the opening session to welcome the delegates. Because of protocol, Premier Eshkol's message of greeting was read to the assemblage.

Premier Eshkol said a joint responsibility of Zionists abroad and in Israel was "to enrich the cultural and spiritual life of Israel by a strong stream of immigration from countries free, more affluent materially, and richer culturally."

Conceding that life in Israel was less easy than in the United States, the Premier added that Israel remained, nonetheless, a challenge to those who accept "adventure at the outset and to those who wish to live a Jewish life.

President Shazar praised the American Zionists for their material and political aid. He too urged renewed efforts to encourage American-Jewish youth to settle in Israel. He also appealed for greater Jewish and Zionist educational efforts abroad.

Rabbi Abba Hillel Silver, of Cleveland, Ohio, honorary president of the Zionist Organization and chairman of the convention, and Dr. Max Nussbaum, president of the Organization, says the New York Times, both sadly recalled what Rabbi Silver referred to as "unsolicited lectures, scoldings, and admonitions" directed at American Zionists by "some quarters" in Israel.

The ZOA president asked for Israeli moral support of Zionism as "indispensable" for the movement's continued existence. He warned that the Zionist movements disappearance would be "catastrophe" for both Israel and the Jewish people, and that the vacuum thus created would be filled by "assimilationist and isolationist philosophies."

The speakers, in noting criticism of Zionism, were apparently referring to former Prime Minister David Ben-Gurion among others, although no names were mentioned, says the New York Herald Tribune. Mr. Ben-Gurion, frequent critic of the Zionist movement, held that only a Jew who immigrates or plans to immigrate to Israel can legitimately call himself a Zionist and aroused Zionist ire by allegedly granting equality or even preference to non-Zionist groups abroad in dealings with Israel.

declared, "and it will be a Zionism true to itself and its part, respected by all — here and abroad."

Letter Of U.S. Leaders Says Soviet Trumped-Up Charges Of Economic Crimes Use Jews As Scapegoat

Three men, two with Jewish-sounding names, have been ordered shot in the Ukranian seaport of Odessa for a leading role in the black-market manufacture and sale of 3,250 women's woolen pullovers, writes David Miller to the New York Herald Tribune from Moscow. Implicated with them were 28 others who received various prison terms, including three of 15 years each. The ring took profits of 100,000 rubles ($110,000) in operations that lasted from September, 1961, to April, 1962.

Sentenced by the Odessa regional court to be shot with confiscation of property were a man named Kunyansky, chief engineer of the Defender of the Motherland knitted goods factory; Malamud, chief bookkeeper of another plant, and Stankevich, chief of the regional Department of Industry. Who took large bribes. No first or middle names were given, but Kunyansky and Malamud are believed to be Jewish.

The newspaper Pravda, of the Ukraine, said Kunyansky and others organized a woolen knitted goods factory in 1959 with money obtained illegally through speculation. In the Soviet Union the government controls all manufacturing and business and is

American leaders in New York said in a letter to Izvestia that the Soviet campaign has been sharpened in the last two years with systematic trumped-up charges of economic crimes "for which the Jews have been used as the scapegoat."

By contrast, in the U.S., the leaders said, Jews are completely free to express their own concept of Jewish identity, reports the New York Herald Tribune, select the religious institutions of their choice, read newspapers and journals and books in English, Hebrew, or Yiddish, and support the institutions they wish to support.

Three leading Jewish organizations charged the Soviet government newspaper Izvestia with "shocking distortions" about Jews and anti-Semitism in the United States, in the open letter to the newspaper, edited by Alexei Adzhubei, son-in-law of Premier Nikita S. Khrushchev. They asked for correction of "the gross misinformation" in an article that said anti-Semitism existed on a "colossal" scale in the United States.

Signers of the letter were A. M. Sonnabend, president of the American Jewish Committee; Dr. Jochim Prinz, president of the American Jewish Congress; and Label Katz, president of the 119-year-old fraternal organization, Bnai Brith.

The Izvestia article said U. S. charges of anti-Semitism in the Soviet Union had been made to cover up a situation where "working Jews in the United States suffer unbelievable humiliations because of discrimination and anti-Semitism."

In refutation, the Jewish leaders asserted that while there are "tragic imperfections" in intergroup relations in the U.S. civil rights groups have brought about profound changes in attitudes. "This," their statement said, "may explain why anti-Semitism is today at its lowest level in American history."

"It would give us deep satisfaction if Russian Jews, too, could have organizations to combat anti-Semitism and prejudice in their society," the agency spokesman observed, says the New York Herald Tribune. The Jewish leaders assailed the Izvestia correspondent — the article was signed "K. Smirnov" — with "outrageously" twisting facts "with deliberate intend to discredit the United States, and falsifying material about anti-Semitism issued by their organizations."

As an example of distortion in Izvestia, they cited the attempt to give the impression that "important officials of the United States government are members or supporters of George Lincoln Rockwell's miniscule American Nazi party." It noted that Rockwell's Nazi doctrines and activities had been condemned by both the Attorney General and the President of the U.S.

The Jewish leaders attacked the Soviet press for conveying a "viciously negative image of Jews."

Sip this wine...
memories will come flooding back

At the next shabbat evening meal at the next simcha, perhaps tomorrow night . . . sip a glass of Mazel Tov. This is a wine you'll remember. It's a wine that will bring back memories of other wines you have sipped, of other Friday evening meals, of other Yom Tovim.

Mazel Tov is made, like the other wines you remember, of Concord grapes, grown on the sunny slopes of the Niagara Peninsula. It is a richly honest wine . . . a wine of memories.

Although Mazel Tov is made strictly "Kosher l'Pesach", it is available all year 'round.

Rachel's Visit: A Memory Of A Childhood In The East End Of London

BY RAIE ROSWELL

The South-easter had died down and Cape Town sweltered in the breathless heat that followed. I was busy watering the plants in the window-box on the stoop when I heard someone coming up the steps. It was a salesman who looked tired and extremely hot and whose clothes were much the worse for wear. He was selling soap-flakes, and I asked him how much he wanted for a box.

"Only two an' a tanner, lady."

"I'll take a box to try," I told him. And then, noticing the beads of perspiration trickling down his face, I added, "Would you like something cool to drink?"

He looked at me gratefully. "Lady," he said, "right now, there's nothing I'd like better."

I fetched him an ice-cold orangeade, and after taking a few thirsty gulps, he said, "From London, too, ain't you?"

From London . . . yes . . . yes . . . and suddenly my thoughts were spinning down the years, and I was a child again on a much-loved visit to my grandparent's tailor shop in the East End of London. The shop was wedged in between a number of others all belonging to the Jewish community of the district.

Although most of them had absorbed the typical Cockney accent and mannerisms, essentially they were still Jews. Friday evening being the sabbath, my parents always went to supper with my grandparents, and as a special treat I would go there early in the morning, as I was the youngest grandchild and the only one not yet at school.

The shop was dark inside, but to me it always seemed safe and secure there, due, no doubt, to my grandfather's gentle manners and appearance. When I entered the shop he would lift up his eyes slowly from his work and peer at me over the top of his steel-rimmed spectacles as I went up to greet him and kiss his smooth forehead. — "Ah, if it ain't our little Rachel. An' how's my girl to-day? Still as pretty as ever?" He would scratch around in his waistcoat pockets for a sixpence for me. "Go on up an' see your Bobba now — there's a good girl."

Steps at the back of the shop led up to the apartment where my grandparents lived. The wonderful, warm smell of cooking always came from the kitchen where my granny would be fussing over the food for the evening meal. She had lovely, silver hair, but it was always covered by a black, crocheted cap even when she was indoors. When she saw me she would wipe her hands (usually on her apron) cup my face between them, and kiss me warmly on both cheeks.

"Glad you came nice an' early, Rochela, saves me running down for the fish myself. First, let me give you some taigelach an' a nice piece of cake, an' then you can run over to Mr. Tockar for the order."

Having finished the cake, which was my granny's specialty — a sort of sponge cake sprinkled with sweetened poppy seeds — I would go out on the errands that had been set aside for my Friday visit.

It was sheer delight to push through the crowds of people that thronged the pavements. Although I had been told to hurry — I did exactly the opposite! I watched the horses and drays plodding slowly along, and the delivery boys on bikes daringly dodging in and out of their way.

The shops were a source of unending pleasure for me, especially as there was a sixpence in my pocket waiting to be spent. I would press my nose up against the window of the bakery and admire the pyramids of golden-brown kitka loaves, rye bread and crisp, shiny bagels all freshly baked for shabbat (Sabbath). The delicious smell of warm bread that drifted out of the door, made my mouth water.

But, of course, it was at Mr. Lewis's sweet shop that I spent my money. Huge jars of ball's eye peppermints, [illegible] and other exciting sweets lined the counter. I entered the shop with a feeling akin to that of stepping into a treasure house.

Mr. Lewis would come up to the counter. "An' what can I do for you, young lady?" "Please may I have two licorice sticks and threepence peppermint creams?" "Here y'are, penn'orth o' licorice, an' threepence creams. An' don't forget y'r change."

The fish shop was just around the corner from Mr. Lewis's shop. I did not like the smell very much, but if I sucked vigorously on a peppermint it helped to overcome the fishy odour. Mrs. Tockar was small and plump; she had wispy, black hair and wore pince-nez glasses.

"Well, well, an' if it ain't Hannah Friedman's little Rachel. Nu, an' what's for you, to-day? Oh, yes, your Bobba's order. Alf . . . Alf . . . bring Mrs. Segal's order."

Along shuffled Mr. Tockar. He was also very small and stooped over so much that his back seemed quite bent.

"Fine big girl you're gettin' to be. Soon be as big as y'r mother, eh? Here's a nice firm piece of hake, just right for the gefilte fish. We put in a bit of lax (smoked salmon) for your Zeida, too. Tell Bobba some nice schmalz herrings come in yesterday, just in case she should fancy to have a couple."

In front of the counter stood barrels of herrings and jars of pickled cucumbers and olives. Pinching my cheek, Mr. Tockar would say, "Now, what can we give little Rachel!" Then he would plunge his fingers into a jar of olives and hand me a few. I loved olives and tucked them into the pocket of my jacket, relishing the thought of enjoying them when the sweets were all finished. The pips could be sucked for hours and hours.

I would walk home slowly, listening to the noise all around me — the voices of the women who stood in groups gossiping on the pavements, the hoarse cries of the barrow men, and the jeers and yells of the swarms of urchins whose succulent language never failed to fascinate me.

After the noise of the streets, when I entered my grandfather's shop, I felt as though I were stepping into another world. I would hurry up to my granny who would be impatiently waiting for me to return.

"You been gorn ages, my darling. Now let's see what Mrs. Tockar sent to-day." She examined the fish carefully. "Well, now isn't that kind of Mrs. Tockar, she's put in a bit of lax. Just what we love, too."

"Bobba, Mr. Tockar said I was to tell you that he got some schmalz herrings in yesterday. He thought may be you might like a few."

"Yes, that'll be nice — I'll get some next week an' pickle them."

My grandfather did not come upstair for lunch on Fridays because there was always too much work to do in the shop. Usually we had thick soup with lokshen (noodles) in it, and my granny would let me carry down a bowlful for him to the shop.

Early in the afternoon we put the snow-white cloth on the dining-room table at which the family of ten would be seated. While I carefully set the places, my granny would rub up the heavy candle-sticks which had been brought from Spain by my great-grandmother. These were put on the table together with the matches in their delicately carved silver case. The wine in a sparkling decanter, the kiddush cups, also family heirlooms, — two crisp kitka loaves covered with an embroidered napkin, and a large bowl of fruit were finally set out. How proud I was to help my granny set the shabbat table!

"Go down to the shop now, Rachel, and tell your Zeida (grandfather) that it is near time for him to be finishing off."

Downstairs there was furious activity, as the shop would be closed until Monday, and there were always the last minute orders to be finished off. I would stand watching Harry pressing trousers with a heavy iron that sent up hissing clouds of steam.

"Cor stone the crows," he would grumble, "the way you 'ave to work 'ere on a Friday makes you think it's y'r last bloomin' day on this 'ere earth. Blimey, Miss Rachel, it's thinkin' of gittin' outer 'ere I am, an' no kiddin'." He was fond of my grandfather nonetheless, and worked for him for many years to come.

In the scramble, someone would knock over a roll of cloth or spill some pins or chalk, and then my grandfather would shake his head sadly and say, "Now look what you've been an' gorn an' done." At last Harry would leave with the last orders to be delivered, the boards would be put up outside, and the little shop would be quiet and deserted for the following two days.

My grandfather and I would climb the stairs together, and as he slowly went along he paused every now and again to make such remarks as: "Don't ever be a tailor, Rachel, my child, ruins y'r eyes." After he had rested a while we would go on until at last we reached the top landing.

"You been a long way from 'ere, lady."

With a sudden jolt I realized that the salesman had spoken to me, and I brushed away the tears that were brimming in my eyes.

"Yes," I answered slowly, "I've been off Mile End Road."

"Blimey," he replied, looking knowingly at me, "that must 'ave been a bit of orlright."

SAM JACOB'S WIT IN PARLIAMENT

The following is from "All Our Yesterdays", in the Montreal Gazette, by Edgar Andrew Collard:

Today I wish to thank Mr. A. Kirk Cameron of Westmount for sending me his recollections of the late Samuel William Jacobs, K.C., one of the outstanding members of the Canadian Parliament, and one of the greatest wits Parliament has ever known. Mr. Cameron, a close friend of Sam Jacobs, describes how wonderfully ready that wit was, and how it enlivened Parliament's proceedings, as well as giving zest and sparkle to his private conversation. Here are Mr. Cameron's recollections:

It is 25 years this August since the death of Sam Jacobs in 1938. Pleasant memories of his many-facetted character linger in the minds of the fast-diminishing number of his contemporaries.

This is a short story of his career as member of the House of Commons from 1917 to 1932, and particularly an explanation of how he became known as the greatest wit and humorist in the House since the days of Jo Rhymal.

There was a redistribution of federal seats in Canada following the general election of 1911. It was brought to the attention of Sir Wilfrid Laurier that there were a number of seats where the Jewish vote, if cast for one party, would elect a Liberal. Sir Wilfrid urged that the Cartier division in Montreal be set up in such a way that a Jewish member could be elected. This was done.

In the election of 1917 Sam was nominated for Cartier and was elected, thereby becoming the first Jew to sit as a member in Ottawa. He was reelected in 1921, 1925, 1926, 1930 and 1935. In every election his opponents lost their deposits.

Sam Jacob's debut as a wit came early. The final bill for taking over the various railways to form the Canadian National was being debated in the House. W. S. Fielding, in the course of his speech, asked, "Now, Mr. Speaker, that we have this 'white elephant', how are we going to feed him?"

Laconically, from behind him came Sam's voice — "through his Grand Trunk." The veteran Fielding was knocked out of stride and the House roared.

From the time he entered the House till his death Jacobs hammered hard for more liberal immigration laws. Speaking during Jim Robb's first budget debate, he pleaded "Why should these people not be allowed to come in?" They would, in Isaiah's words, make the rough places smooth, and the desert blossom as the rose.

Ted Garland, member for Bow River, and himself an immigrant from Ireland ten years before, here interjected, "What would the honorable member do with these people if they failed as farmers?" Sam shot back, "They could run for Parliament, as you did." It took the Speaker some time to restore order.

Sam punned as naturally as he breathed. When Harry Thaw, after murdering the architect Stanford White in Madison Square Garden, escaped over the border into the Eastern Townships, Jerome, the Attorney-General of New York, had Jacobs represent him at the extradition proceeding in the court house at Sherbrooke. From this followed many years of association and friendship between Jerome and Jacobs.

Jerome, on one of his visits to Montreal, was having dinner with Sam at the Ritz Carlton. For more than an hour there was a battle of wits; Sam punned with unfailing readiness. Visibly annoyed, and feeling himself worsted, Jerome said, "Jacobs, I'll give you something you cannot pun. It's the signs of the Zodiac." The last word was hardly spoken, when Sam said, "I can-sir."

In 1929 Lord Melchett, the British lawyer who had become a Member of Parliament and an industrialist, was in Montreal on business. He was asked to address a meeting of the Zionist Association at Sam's residence on Cote St. Antoine Road. Sam requested that I come to his house about four o'clock that afternoon, to help in entertaining the noble lord before the meeting took place. I had known Lord Melchett for several years in business and in other ways.

When Lord Melchett arrived, we were in the music room at the right of the entrance. His lordship was somewhat pompus and a bit stuffy. Shaking hands with Sam Jacobs, he remarked airily, "Mr. Jacobs, I have heard of you." And Sam remarked dryly, "And I have heard of you."

Recovering, Melchett continued: "Your career and mine are much alike. I was a lawyer and went to the House of Commons. You are a lawyer and in the House of Commons." Sam's comment was, "The difference between you and me, my lord, is that you left the law for the profits."

After the 1917 election Sir Wilfrid Laurier came to the Reform Club for lunch. Several of us sat with him at the round table. He was inquiring of Sam about his victory in Cartier.

"All the women did not vote against you, Sir Wilfrid," said Sam. "On election day a young woman, not on the voters' list, came to my committee room protesting she loved you, Sir Wilfrid, and wanted to vote for you. Later I heard that she had gone so far as to telegraph her vote." Sir Wilfrid remarked, "Did she say that she loved me, Sam? She loved much, much should be forgiven her."

Reading the Hansard of recent years, one gets the impression that members at Ottawa have forgotten how to laugh. To be sure there is no one such as Sam to provide laughs, as he did ad infinitum. During the years he was in Ottawa I was frequently in the gallery. I cannot recall a sitting, if Sam was there, that ever failed to have several belly laughs. This constant humor acted as a lubricant in getting legislation through.

Rt. Hon. W. S. Fielding, commenting on Sam's gifts as wit and humorist, told a story of how Edward Blake, the Liberal leader before Laurier, had lacked any sense of humor. Austere, aloof, with a towering intellect, he once asked Jo Rhymal, the great parliamentary wit of those days, how he could inject some humor into his manner of speaking.

Jo explained patiently that humor is and must be spontaneous. Blake asked for samples. "Mr. Blake," said Jo, "you are walking to the House in late November or early December. The clouds are lowering. There are intermittent flurries of snow. A friend meets you, salutes, and says, "It looks like a storm.' You say quickly, 'S'no matter'."

The very next day happened to be dark, with snow flurries. A friend passed Edward Blake, and remarked that it looked like a storm. Blake replied, as if far away, "It's immaterial."

In the 1890's Sir John Thompson became the Conservative prime minister. About 1893 Israel Tarte defected from the Conservatives to the Liberals. And about the same time Joe Martin won a by-election for the Liberals in Manitoba.

Tarte had black hair and a beard as glossy as the raven's wing. Martin had a yellow complexion, almost jaundice-colored. Sir Wilfrid and Jim Sutherland ushered Martin to meet the Speaker.

As Martin took his seat, Sir John Thompson rose and congratulated Sir Wilfrid on the accession to his ranks of "the Black Tart and the Yellow Martin."

Such humor—and Sam Jacob's contributions were among the very best—has disappeared from the House of Commons. Debates have become as dull as ditch water. Nowadays there seems to be more snarling than laughing. O God! O Canada!

JEWISH LABOR COMMITTEE ASKS SOVIET TO FREE MOSCOW JEWS JAILED FOR BAKING MATZOHS

The Jewish Labor Committee, in New York, asked that the Soviet government free three Russian Jews who were imprisoned recently on a charge of illegally selling home-made matzohs. The Jewish labor organization, which has an affiliated membership of 500,000, denounced the imprisonment on July 17 of the three Moscow Jews: Golko Bogomolny, Mrs. Klavdiy Blyakhman, and Mrs. Malka Brio.

The three, plus a fourth, an 82-year-old invalid who was set free, were found guilty by a Soviet People's Court of "profiteering" in the sale last spring of matzohs that they baked in their homes. They were sentenced to jail terms ranging from six months to one year. Protesting the verdict of the Soviet court, the Jewish Labor Committee issued the following statement charging that it was the Soviet government, not the defendants, which had committed a crime, by its prohibition of the public baking of matzohs:

"The imprisonment of three Moscow Jews on the spurious charge of selling home-made matzohs is a cruel act characteristic of the Soviet government's attitude toward its Jewish citizens. The sentencing of Golko Bogomolny, Mrs. Klavdiy Blyakhman, and Mrs. Malka Brio to prison terms ranging from six months to one year is in itself a shocking instance of injustice to three helpless individuals. But more than that, it is symbolic of the status of Jews in the Soviet Union: An ill-treated, minority, which, it appears, is often used as a scapegoat by the Soviet government.

"The actual crime in this patently fraudulent case was committed not by the three unfortunate prisoners, but by the Soviet government itself. In 1962 it ordered all state bakeries to cease the long-standing practise of baking Passover matzohs for sale to Jews. In 1963 it went even further by adding a prohibition against the baking of matzohs in synagogue kitchens. When our organizations, upon learning of this clamp-down, offered to ship only a supply of matzohs, at our own expense, for distribution to Soviet Jews, the offer was ignored.

"Now we learn that the few helpless, elderly persons who baked matzohs at home and shared their small surplus with friends, at the cost of a few rubles to cover their own expenses and labor, are publicly condemned as criminals and sentenced to prison. This despite the fact that the Orthodox Church regularly sells religious articles on its holidays and Soviet peasants also regularly sell the surpluses from their small, private, vegetable gardens.

The Jewish people have from time immemorial celebrated their liberation from bondage in Egypt with the eating of matzohs on Passover. For Orthodox Jews, the use of matzohs in the Passover ritual, and abstention from bread, are not only traditional but also a requirement of Jewish law. To deny them matzohs is to violate their most elementary religious rights.

"We call upon all men of goodwill throughout the world to raise their voices against these inhumane actions by the Soviet regime. We ask the Soviet government to release the three Jewish victims, to restore the right of Soviet Jews to obtain matzohs from state bakeries, and to grant to its Jewish citizens the same religious, cultural, and civic rights as to all other Soviet citizens."
